

MORNING APPEAL.

Wednesday... December 22 1886

A HINT TO LABOR ORGANIZATIONS.

In San Francisco are thousands of people who are either compelled to work for a mere pittance or go without employment. The testimony now being taken before a commission in reference to the strikes show that men are compelled to work as high as seventeen hours a day for $2.25 on cars where they are subjected to cold winds and rain, which few constitutions can long stand. If a man were to work twenty years at this business at the rates paid by companies, he would leave nothing to his family when he died except a legacy of poverty to his wife, and bad constitutions to his children.

A big city seems to be the Mecca of almost every man starting out in life. A young man goes there because he thinks he is bound to get a good situation where there are so many things to be done. Thus the big cities are always overstocked with men who are glad to get work at any price. Thousands of men will hang about a big city for years, either doing the hardest kind of work on the smallest possible pay, or living from hand to mouth in idleness, fleeced with occasional crime, and the idea never occurs to them to go out into the country and try to build themselves up. The labor organizations seem to have but one policy, and that is, to keep up a certain scale of wages. When a strike comes the order is called upon to support the strikers, and the men who work are taxed to support those who do not.

In some of these strikes throughout the United States millions of dollars have been squandered with no results.

Now, suppose these vast sums expended in unprofitable assaults on capital were expended in taking up good lands on the public domain and putting the unemployed strikers on the land to convert it into grass, live stock and other produce, how much better in the long run would it be for the strikers?

Whenever the wages of a monopoly did not suit the organization they could draw off one hundred men and send them out to the land owned by the organization to work for six months or a year. They could keep on locating or buying more land every year, and presently the men on the land would cease to be a burden to the organization, and in a few years more the land would be paying handsomely.

Were all the organizations to adopt this policy labor would become so scarce in the big cities that wages would be higher.

Again, the manufacture of supplies for the extra amount of land put under cultivation would increase the profits of the manufacturers and they would be glad to pay higher wages. Would not this be vastly better than for thousands of men on a strike to be laying about cheap gin mills, squandering their earnings?

When a man finds the city unprofitable he had better build a log cabin in the country on a little patch of land, and if he works steadily and saves his money, he will be pretty independent in ten years. If the labor organizations were to co-operate with this system they would soon find a place where their idle men could be employed, and the wrongs they complain of would soon be things of the past.

The Austin Reville has this to say concerning Mr. Toggart the new editor of the Enterprise:

The editor of the Territorial Enterprise has received much abuse from the State papers, and is slightly alluded to as being imported from New York. In our estimation he holds his ground making the Enterprise a direct exponent of its name. The paper is no more a misnomer. If all imported editors are like the Enterprise's it would be a good thing to have more of them in the State.

The APPEAL can indorse everything in the above. Mr. Toggart has earned the respect of the Nevada press and has run the Enterprise in the groove of a self-respecting first-class newspaper. Slighting allusions to him have only come from editors who have no way of knowing what first-class journalism means.
